

Talking About Privacy in Auckland

A series of free public presentations on everything to do with privacy in today's digital age

Talking About Privacy in Auckland is a coordinated project of the Office of the Privacy Commissioner, Privacy Foundation NZ, iappANZ and Auckland Council.

This occasional series of free public talks will cover all sorts of topics touching on privacy in today's digital age. We'll explore the impacts of new technology, be updated on legal cases and reform of our 25 year old Privacy Act, uncover lessons from research, learn about privacy rights and how to exercise control over your personal information, listen to how businesses are protecting or risking personal information and anything else affecting individuals.

The four partner organisations are coordinating their efforts to make this diverse programme of presentations freely available to the Auckland public. Each talk will be presented on behalf of one of the partner organisations.

THIS IS A FREE EVENT.

Blockchain's Promise for Privacy

Tuesday 27 February 2018: 12.30-1.30pm

Associate Professor Alex Sims
Department of Commercial Law, University of Auckland

Some believe that blockchain technology signals the end of privacy. However, blockchain can be used to protect privacy. Indeed, blockchain promises to provide people with more control over their personal information than they currently have.

Please join us and learn about blockchain from one of New Zealand's foremost experts on the topic.

Alex teaches a wide range of commercial law subjects. Her primary areas of research and publication are on blockchain technology (currently the regulation of cryptocurrencies, legal issues surrounding smart contracts and DAOs), consumer law and intellectual property law (in particular copyright law). Alex is a committee member of the NZ Privacy Foundation.

Venue: Ellen Melville Centre – Pioneer Women's Hall, Freyberg Place, Auckland
Located in the heart of the High Street District, connecting High St to the O'Connell St shared space and Chancery Square, overlooking Freyberg Place.
